Even though May consumer spending disappointed, real personal consumption is on track for solid growth in the second quarter as a result of a strong March and April performance. Also important, the decline in May spending was entirely due to a steep decline in household outlays for utility services. Excluding that decline, real personal consumption increased by the most since last December, consistent with strong jobs growth and confidence levels. — Merrill Lynch

MARKET OUTLOOK

Expectations for near-term growth have been ramped up significantly following favorable reports on April international trade and consumer spending. The May employment data reinforced this view, with employers adding 223,000 jobs and the unemployment rate falling to 3.8 percent. The strength is broadening, with a rising share of industries adding jobs and the ISM indices and consumer confidence remaining at historically high levels. We are now looking for real GDP to rise at a 4.2 percent annual rate in the second quarter and grow 3.0 percent for 2018 as a whole.

Stronger economic gains and the tightening labor market are stoking fears that the Fed might tighten monetary policy more aggressively to head off higher inflation. Such concerns are premature. While the labor market has tightened, wages are still rising modestly and inflation should remain close to the Fed's 2 percent target. Productivity growth is almost certain to improve this year, given rising output in the goods sector, increased investment and stronger output growth relative to employment.

Even if inflation were to run slightly above 2 percent for a few months, we feel the debate will remain whether the Fed hikes the federal funds rate a total of three or four times this year. We are still looking for a total of four quarter-point hikes in 2018 but growth will have to remain strong and the global economy will need to stay out of trouble. A low unemployment rate and rising wages, which were long sought after and still have plenty of ground to recoup, are no reason to invert the yield curve and short circuit what may well be a record setting expansion. — Wells Fargo Advisors

Expectations for near-term growth have been ramped up significantly following favorable reports on April international trade and consumer spending. The May employment data reinforced this view, with employers adding 223,000 jobs and the unemployment rate falling to 3.8 percent. The strength is broadening, with a rising share of industries adding jobs and the ISM indices and consumer confidence remaining at historically high levels. We are now looking for real GDP to rise at a 4.2 percent annual rate in the second quarter and grow 3.0 percent for 2018 as a whole.

Stronger economic gains and the tightening labor market are stoking fears that the Fed might tighten monetary policy more aggressively to head off higher inflation. Such concerns are premature. While the labor market has tightened, wages are still rising modestly and inflation should remain close to the Fed's 2 percent target. Productivity growth is almost certain to improve this year, given rising output in the goods sector, increased investment and stronger output growth relative to employment.

Even if inflation were to run slightly above 2 percent for a few months, we feel the debate will remain whether the Fed hikes the federal funds rate a total of three or four times this year. We are still looking for a total of four quarter-point hikes in 2018 but growth will have to remain strong and the global economy will need to stay out of trouble. A low unemployment rate and rising wages, which were long sought after and still have plenty of ground to recoup, are no reason to invert the yield curve and short circuit what may well be a record setting expansion. — Wells Fargo Advisors
